HVAC EDGE Report

Maximizing Efficiency by Sealing Ductwork

Your air duct system moves air throughout your house. When it isn't working properly, it creates two big problems: wasted energy, and inaccurate temperature settings in key parts of your home. It also makes your furnace or air conditioning unit work harder, resulting not only in increased energy usage, but the risk of a costly breakdown. If you're dealing with high energy bills or heating or cooling "dead spots" in your home, it could be due to leaks in your duct system.

When air escapes your duct before it reaches its intended destination, it can make some parts of your home overly hot or cold while other rooms get very little air flow. This forces your furnace or air conditioning unit to work harder, longer.

Detecting Leaks

HVAC professionals use an air pressure system to detect tiny holes in your duct system. Significant gaps and holes are easier to spot and address, but the smaller holes are more of a challenge. These holes can appear due to corrosion or because there are gaps between joints or in the connection to registers in your rooms. Even though these holes are small, they can add up in terms of energy efficiency problems. In fact, the average home loses 20% of the air from their furnace or air conditioning before it gets to the intended room due to duct leakage.

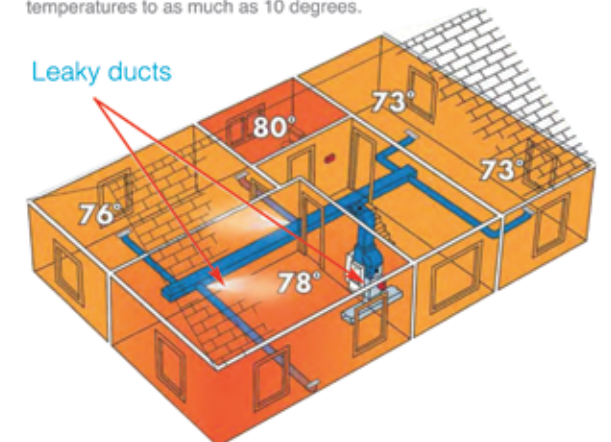

Leak Sealing and Repair

Once detected these holes or gaps can be fixed by making repairs, replacing portions of your ductwork, filling in gaps, or using other sealing methods. These minor repairs can help your energy efficiency levels a great deal. Thankfully, most duct leakage problems can be addressed with simple sealing solutions but finding those leaks can be a challenge for homeowners.

When your air ducts are sealed properly, your airflow system works better and maximizes the efficiency of your heating and cooling system. Have questions about duct sealing? Call us today!

Varying Room Temperatures

Leaky ducts can cause varying rooms temperatures to as much as 10 degrees.

Benefits of Water Heater Flush

Over time sediment from hard water can build up at the bottom of your water heater tank. Years of build up can cause problems like temperature fluctuations, increased energy cost, reduction in hot water supply, noisy unit, or worse a burst tank. During a water heater flush, the water is drained from the tank to flush out any sediment, this helps to avoid prolonged build up and keeps your system running efficiently all year long.

- Benefits
- Prolonged equipment life
 - Decrease in operational noise
 - Improved Efficiency
